A popular magazine has agreed to stop running sex ads in its back pages.

New York Magazine said it will no longer accept the classified ads, after the local chapter of the National Organization for Woman threatened to hold protests against the magazine — saying the ads promote prostitution and human trafficking.

In a statement, the group praised the decision saying: "... New York Magazine has taken a real leadership position in the industry by wanting to segue away from carrying these types of ads."

NOW has won similar agreements from 14 other publications, including the Village Voice and New York Press.
